The Dean's Message

STUDENTS OF THE HARVARD BUSINESS SCHOOL:

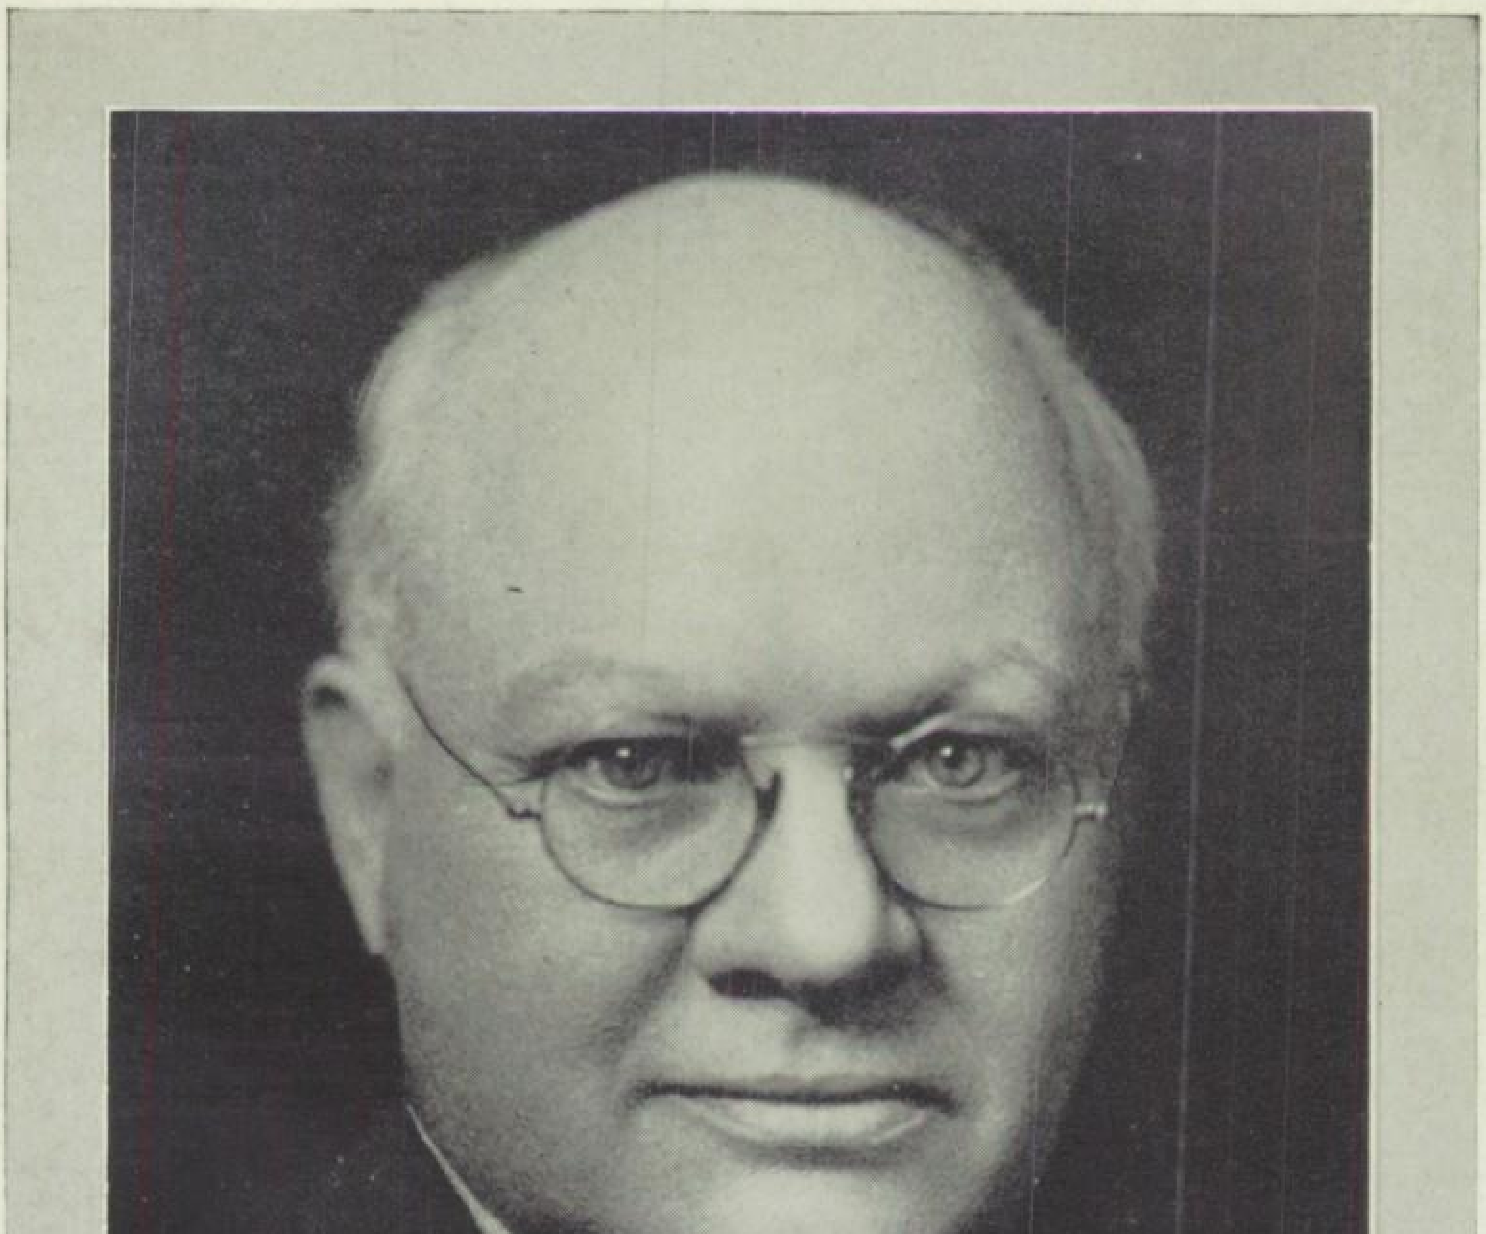

The rapidity with which generations change, not only in a school but in the succession of young men going into active life, makes it easy to have even a strong individuality like the founder of this School slowly fade away. The group of buildings which we occupy was completed ten years ago and Mr. Baker died in 1931. The inspiration of his life, his gift and his manner of giving it are still strong in the Faculty of the School. I can do no better here than to quote from the editorial in our Alumni Bulletin published at the time of his death. By his gift to the Harvard Business School, he dowered it

"with more than money, inasmuch as he gave it renewed strength and courage to do a work essential in this momentous century when traditions are being shaken to pieces and men must face the fact of change.

"Mr. Baker was never a man to say much, but what he was and what he did stand out clearly. One of his most marked characteristics was a certain homely kindness with which all that knew him were acquainted. He could find time in all the cares of a business that at times was vast in its proportions to think of individuals and their needs, to give these, as it were, his personal attention and to let them know that he was really thinking of them. He was, if you choose, an old-fashioned man, but there was nothing old-fashioned in the vigor of his mind and the uprightness of his character. These were so marked that the term old-fashioned loses its meaning. . . . . .

"It is a great relief when we see one who, when he has something to do, does it, letting the action speak for itself and the motives be weighed by the ultimate fairness that fortunately resides in all men. Mr. Baker trusted Harvard and its Business School enough to help them magnificently. Trusting them, he trusted youth and loved it, giving it what should help in the great task that is facing all Americans. He did trust youth, but it is more correct to say that in these fundamental things there is neither youth nor age, they are above the years and untouched by them. He helped to give a still stronger anchorage to an undertaking that marches with progress, and he did so in a matter of fact and tranquil way."
